THESE STEELWORKERS are putting together a "steel sandwich" at U. S. Steel's Homestead District Works, Pittsburgh, in an experiment that has produced the world's widest and thinnest stainless steel sheets so vital to the nation's future aircraft and missile program. The recipe calls for two "bread slices" of one-inch thick carbon steel plates to hold the "Dagwood" filling of three stainless or alloy steel plates "battered" with a special separating compound. The filler plates of stainless are more than a quarter inch thick. The assembly is welded together, heated in mill ovens and then rolled through standard mill machinery. If rolled one at a time the stainless or alloy steel plates would cool too quickly to respond effectively to thickness reduction. Passed back and forth through the rolls the sandwich becomes thinner and each layer undergoes the same amount of reduction. Finally the filler sheets are about a tenth as thick as at the outset.

"BEFORE AND AFTER" results of rolling several plates of stainless steel compacted into a "sandwich" at Homestead District Works. The "sandwich" rolling process yielded the world's widest stainless steel sheet at the right, measured at 90 inches by U. S. Steel secretary Dolores Reese. The stainless sheet at the left portrays the approximate size of the "sandwich" before rolling and also dramatizes the 48 inch width of stainless sheet available to the aircraft and missile industry currently. Further experiments are being conducted to refine the sandwich rolling technique. The need for wider stainless steel sheets became a "must" as designers specified stainless and alloy steel for strength and lightness for supersonic planes and missiles. The "sandwich process" marks a major break-through in the effort to find a means for mill-producing wider thingage sheets.
